The Peoples State Bank and the Depression

By David Larson

In the 1930s, in the wake of the Great Depression, the banking system in Belvidere was not spared. The Boone County Banking Federation, composed of all of the State and National banks in the county, independently declared a freeze on bank deposits. On February 1, 1932, the declaration was made public in the local daily newspaper stating that, as of the next day of business, a Tuesday, the depositors in Boone County banks would not be able to withdraw money from their deposit accounts. But, checking accounts would be honored. It was explained that the recent local and national run on banks for cash and the business climate that it created made it necessary to protect the local depositors. Boone County banks were sound and local assets secured the local loans made by the banks in the Federation. But, if the run continued, it was stated in the declaration, the banks would have no choice but to call outstanding loans and force a liquidation of local assets securing the loans. Local farms and real estate primarily secured these loans. A run on the banks, it was argued, would cause the economy of the community to collapse because the collateral assets would be liquidated, prices would collapse, and ruin many businesses and families.

Runs on banks had been occurring in Rockford and Chicago, as well as nationwide. The local banking community asserted, in the declaration that, "this was to protect the depositor from himself." It is not clear to this writer if that unilateral action by the Federation was established legally, as it was a year before the Roosevelt "bank holiday," but, nevertheless; that's what happened in February of 1932 in Boone County.

The bottom in the economy had still not been reached in the United States in February of 1932. That would not occur for another year, but until then, the promises of a new president sustained hope. These promises took the form of stimulus packages, Social Security, Federal Deposit Insurance, and Keynesian economics among others. In March of 1933, Roosevelt declared a 4-day national banking holiday, which closed all banks in the country. The Federal Reserve Bank restructured itself at the end of the closure period with the creation of 12 regional Federal Reserve Banks. They had the power to issue currency so that banks could reopen, and they did.

What followed was the largest percentage gain in the stock market in one day. That record was broken just this week, because of confidence that a stimulus package would pass Congress. The Roosevelt New Deal, of which the new Federal Reserves System played a part, spurred a period of economic growth, which lasted until a 1937-38 recession, just prior to World War II.

New federal banking regulations required two of the four Belvidere banks in the Boone County Banking Federation to join the Federal Reserve system: The People's State Bank, and The Farmers State Bank.

In May of 1933, it was announced that The People's State Bank would undergoing an examination by the Feds for a final approval of a merger acquisition by The Farmers State Bank

Community Health Centers Ask State for Emergency Funding

Illinois congressional delegation signs appeal letter to governor

by Rebecca Anzel Capitol News Illinois

The novel coronavirus could "create long-lasting, devastating damage" to Illinois health care facilities that serve vulnerable communities.

Community health centers are treating fewer patients than normal after all 390 locations around the state canceled routine and preventative medical visits to slow the spread of COVID-19 per guidance from federal and state officials.

That means fewer government reimbursements for facilities that use them to pay staff salaries and purchase supplies. According to a report from Capital Link, community health centers in Illinois are projected to lose almost $140 million in revenue over the next three months, or 70 percent of the business typically generated.

This segment of the state's health care safety net is already underfunded by about $150 million annually, Jordan Powell, president of Illinois Primary Health Care Association, said.

"This could have a long-lasting impact on the health center delivery system," he said. "Because we're already underfunded, it only exacerbates the short-term problem we're facing right now."

Illinois' entire congressional delegation signed a letter to Gov. JB Pritzker urging the state to allocate temporary funding to alleviate these centers' potential need to lay off staff or permanently shutter facilities.

"It would be unthinkable for a community health center to be forced to close due to a lack of adequate resources," the representatives wrote. "... While we understand that Illinois will have to make tough choices in the days, weeks, and months ahead, adequate funding provided directly to our

Illinois National Guard Dispels Rumors of Military Action Related to Covid-19

'Citizen soldiers' providing 'professional skills to help out,' general says

by Ben Orner Capitol News Illinois

The Illinois National Guard is assisting the state's COVID-19 response by setting up testing centers and other civil action, not preparing for military action as has been rumored on social media, its adjutant general said during a news briefing on the virus Monday.

Brig. Gen. Richard Neely, adjutant general of the Illinois National Guard, reassured Illinoisans at Gov. JB Pritzker's daily coronavirus news conference in Chicago.

"We're not doing any policing action," Neely said. "We're not doing any kind of work at all like that"

Pritzker's disaster proclamation on March 9 authorized Army and Air National Guard soldiers to help with these state's response to COVID-19. Since then, soldiers have been providing civil, medical and logistical assistance, including engineering and HVAC duties.

"These are your citizen soldiers ... that are trained in many different skillsets," Neely said.

Neely said the Guard has begun setting up testing centers and some members have even tested health care workers and first responders for COVID-19 in Rosemont, with greater public testing upcoming. He said other soldiers are helping distribution of medical equipment, while a "specialized engineering team" is surveying closed-down hospital sites.

"They're actually looking at the heating, the plumbing, the electrical throughout those facilities and identifying which ones are easy to community health centers now will ensure we are ready to overcome these challenges.

There is no funding amount cited in the letter, but it specifies it "should be adequate for sustaining the provision of core health services in addition to responding to the coronavirus pandemic, and they must be flexible enough to meet the varying needs of our health centers serving Illinois' unique and diverse communities under conditions which are rapidly evolving."

Community health centers are present in each of the state's congressional districts and nearly all state legislative districts, which Powell said attributes to the bipartisan congressional support for funding.

In his daily novel coronavirus briefing Monday, Pritzker was asked what state resources are available to the facilities, which typically treat 1.4 million patients and create 18,500 jobs.

He did not answer the question directly, instead saying, "We want to make sure that those health centers are able to remain open as soon as possible." Pritzker added his administration is collaborating with federal officials to ensure funding is included in a national stimulus bill.

Powell said he and his team have had "extremely positive" near-daily conversations with the governor's staff and representatives from relevant state agencies, and all parties involved "understand the issues we're facing."

"They have a limited amount of resources and there are so many needs out there. It's a difficult problem for them to prioritize those needs," Powell said. "We're asking them to help us stay open, and time really is of the essence right now."

It would cost Illinois' government less money to provide this emergency funding now, he said, than have to deal with the repercussions of facility closures later. Annually, community health centers save taxpayers $2 billion, Powell added.

Community health centers are designed to treat anyone, regardless of their ability to pay. Facilities not only treat medical issues, but substance abuse, dental, vision and behavioral concerns as well as quickly turn on if we need that additional capacity and which are not," Neely said.

The clinics could alleviate pressure on hospitals and emergency rooms as they struggle to treat those with COVID-19, Powell added, if the facilities had enough personal protective equipment for staff. That includes gloves, gowns and face masks.

The Illinois National Guard has also been active on its Twitter account (@IL_Natl_Guard), replying directly to social media users' fears, questions and even conspiracies regarding the Guard's presence.

In recent days, the account has tried to clear up popular videos showing armored vehicles driving on Illinois roads and being transported by train.

"The train moving military equipment is not moving National Guard vehicles," read a tweet on Thursday. "The military moves vehicles all the time. Relax, folks! :)."

The Guard's account has also tweeted confirmations in recent days that soldiers are not shutting down highways, setting up driver checkpoints or preparing to enforce a national quarantine.

"Disinformation can tear us apart. We are part of the community, we live and work alongside you every day," read part of a tweet thread on Friday. "When you see something you question, or that doesn't seem 'normal,' ask us, we're here to make sure you're informed."

Each U.S. state, the District of Columbia and the territories of Puerto Rico, Guam and the U.S. Virgin Islands has its own National Guard. It is the only American military force that can function in a non-military way.

Illinois' Guard, for example, has been previously activated during the Pritzker administration to help with flooding preparation and recovery along the Mississippi River.

The Guard's functions range from nonemergency situations to enforcement of martial law when state and local law enforcement can no longer keep the peace. But even though soldiers are dressed in military uniforms, Neely said, that does not mean they are performing military duties.

"When we show up in camouflage, we tend to draw a crowd, but we're not bringing weapons. We're not bringing anything like that. We're bringing our professional skills to help out," he said.

owned by Hugh K. Funderburg. The banks were seeking permission to merge under terms in which depositors would grant a 30% waiver on deposits in The People's State Bank.

The picture we see this week is the building in Belvidere known as The People's Bank Block, located South State Street in Belvidere. One of The People's State Bank's board members was a local manufacturer by the name of Paul Parson, who was the owner of Parson's Casket in Belvidere. Parson's Casket was a manufacturer hardware for casket industry. He purchased the building after the merger and located offices for his company in the building. If this building still exists, the crown at the top has been removed and it is difficult to locate today. Newspaper evidence reflects a druggist sharing the building with the bank, but it is hard to reconcile the space between buildings, and sheds some doubt on this being in Belvidere, as The People's Bank was a common name used to name banks then.

No Firm Plans Yet for Restarting Session

Hospitals among groups waiting on 'must pass' legislation

by Peter Hancock Capitol News Illinois

The Illinois General Assembly on Monday began its second week of shutdown due to the spread of the novel coronavirus disease, COVID-19, and officials said it is still uncertain when, or under what circumstances, the session will resume.

Officials in the offices of Senate President Don Harmon and House Speaker Michael Madigan said Monday that conversations have been taking place among legislative leaders and their respective caucuses, but as of yet no decision has been made.

"For now, we continue to weigh legislative and procedural priorities so that when we return to session we can be effective and efficient while also protecting public health and safety," Harmon's spokesman, John Patterson, said in an email.

The last day lawmakers met was Thursday, March 5. They were scheduled to be off the following week, March 9-13, as many members campaigned in their home districts during the lead-up to the March 17 primary. They were scheduled to return Wednesday, March 18, but several days before that Gov. JB Pritzker issued a disaster declaration and began urging Illinoisans to practice "social distancing."

"The plan is to monitor and talk with the offices, and come back when it's safe to come back, not only for members of the General Assembly but whatever arrangement we've made relative to the public meeting part," Madigan's spokesman, Steve Brown, said in a phone conversation.

The most important piece of legislation awaiting action is the state budget. Pritzker has proposed a $42 billion spending plan for the fiscal year that begins July 1, some of which depends on voters approving a constitutional amendment in November that would allow the state to levy a graduated income tax that levies higher rates on higher levels of income.

That budget, however, was built around assumptions that the state's economy would continue growing at roughly the same rate it had been growing before the COVID-19 outbreak. The outbreak, however, has forced many businesses to either close temporarily or scale back their operations while many of their employees have been furloughed.

That is certain to have a negative impact on sales and income tax collections for the remainder of the current fiscal year, and the revenue slump could continue into the next fiscal year.

Brown said the impact of such a slump could be eased depending on whether Congress approves an economic recovery package that provides aid to state and local governments. As of Monday, however, that recovery package was stalled in the U.S. Senate.

Meanwhile, there are a number of other bills pending that are considered "must-pass" legislation, meaning the state could face dire consequences if they fail to pass.

One of those is a renewal of the state's hospital assessment program, which generates about $3.5 billion each year to help fund hospitals that treat large numbers of Medicaid patients. Under that program, hospitals are assessed a tax based on the number of inpatient and outpatient procedures they perform.

That money is then used to draw down federal matching funds and it is distributed back to hospitals based on the number of Medicaid patients they serve because Medicaid typically pays lower reimbursement rates than Medicare or private insurance.

Illinois launched that program in 1992 but it must be renewed periodically and each renewal must be approved by the federal government. The current program is set to expire on June 30.

Danny Chun, a spokesman for the Illinois Health and Hospital Association, said in an interview that conversations have been taking place behind the scenes about what the new program should look like, but he said time is a critical factor.

That's because once a bill is passed and signed by the governor, the federal review process could still take two or three months.

Without the hospital assessment program, Illinois hospitals would lose $3.5 billion in revenue at a time when they could be under significant stress treating COVID-19 patients.

Chun said one of the options he has heard discussed would be to call the General Assembly back into session for a single day – possibly even half a day – just to pass a budget and a few other essential bills.

Patterson did not confirm or deny such a plan, saying in an email, "lots of options are being explored and discussed."

Pritzker's Tax Plan will be Biggest Ballot Measure in State History

Is it a "fair tax" or a "blank check?"

Those will be two of the opposing messages Illinois voters will hear between now and November over the governor's proposal to flip the state from a flat income tax rate to a graduated one.

by Tim Jones Better Government Association

The presidential election will be the marquee race on the ballot this November, but in Illinois the most expensive and noisy campaign likely will center on the battle to overhaul the state income tax and require the rich to pay more every year.

By this fall, following what promises to be months of fallout from the coronavirus outbreak, deciding whether to change the Illinois Constitution to replace the current flat-rate income tax with a graduated levy might not seem like the highest priority.

One business group on Thursday even tried to use the pandemic as a reason to pull the measure from the ballot. Whether that effort proves successful or not remains to be seen but in the meantime the issue is expected to result in relentless TV ads, political spin and distortions that hit all of the incendiary themes that have dominated political discourse for years — greed, corruption and incompetence; taxes driving businesses and residents out of the state; the rich not paying their fair share.

The stakes are high.

Democratic Gov. J.B. Pritzker, who stressed the need for the amendment during both his budget and State of the State addresses, has put a $5 million down payment of his own money into a political action committee promoting it. Pritzker is betting the future of his first-term agenda and possible reelection on passage of the amendment, which he predicts will generate an additional $3.4 billion to $3.6 billion a year in revenue while lowering or maintaining the tax burden for 97 percent of Illinois residents.

"We're changing the trajectory of the state," said Quentin Fulks, Pritzker's former deputy campaign manager who now heads the "Vote Yes For Fairness" group leading the graduated tax effort.

Citing $130 billion in unfunded pension liabilities, $8 billion in unpaid bills and the lowest credit rating among the states, Fulks said, "This is something we have to do."

No, say opponents, who have launched several political committees to fight the amendment, including "Vote No on the Blank Check Amendment."

Jason Heffley, executive director of Ideas Illinois, one of the opposition groups, said legislative performance gives voters little hope a graduated tax will solve the state's troubles.

"(Voters are) being asked, 'Hey, trust us,' but what we're saying is we have a General Assembly that has just run amok on spending and hasn't addressed any of the other major problems."

Heffley declined to say how much opponents will spend to defeat the measure, but questioned the financial clout of Pritzker.

"Obviously Pritzker is a wealthy man who has put money behind his causes in the past, but I'm not even sure he has enough money to convince Illinoisans to trust Springfield politicians," Heffley said.

Another group, the Illinois Business Alliance, on Thursday called on Pritzker and the Illinois General Assembly to remove the graduated income tax amendment measure from the November ballot, arguing in a press release that the new tax would hit small businesses harder at a time when they can least afford it.

Among states in the nation that tax income, nine — including Illinois — assess a flat rate while 32 do so on a sliding scale. Illinois has had a flat rate structure since 1969. To change that, 60 percent of those voting on the change will need to approve it, or a simple majority of all those who cast ballots in the election.

Either way, it's no easy lift. And with heavily Democratic Illinois not having had a competitive presidential contest since 1988, experts expect the tax battle to suck up most of the political oxygen.

"I expect this to be incredibly noisy, negative and expensive," said Chris Mooney, a political scientist at the University of Illinois at Chicago. "The people most affected by this have a lot of money, and in Illinois there are no restrictions on how much you can give.

"And on the other side you've got J. B. Pritzker, who has a checkbook the size of the Thompson Center," Mooney said.

In states such as California, where voters have been empowered to cast decisions on everything from banning plastic bags to recalling the governor, ballot measures are commonplace. But the rules are much different in Illinois.

While Illinois voters think of themselves as grizzled political veterans who have seen it all — governors put in prison, shoe boxes stuffed with cash and unrelenting federal investigations involving local and state elected officials — voters here don't have a lot of experience deciding important issues via ballot measures.

Illinois law restricts the number of referenda to three in a statewide election. What's more, most of the time voters are only asked their opinions on matters of public policy — raising the minimum wage, enacting a millionaires' tax — through advisory ballot measures that have no force of law.

"People in Illinois aren't used to ballot questions," said Cynthia Canary, former executive director of the Illinois Campaign for Political Reform. "We're accustomed to nonbinding issues like, 'Should bad guys go to jail?' This is going to be at a whole different level."

Exceptions are rare. In 1980, voters approved a measure reducing the size of the Illinois House of Representatives, to 117 from 180. Four years ago, Illinois voters approved an arcane constitutional change that guaranteed gas tax revenues were only spent on transportation projects. The total spent by interest groups in that campaign was about $3.8 million, according to an analysis by University of Illinois Springfield professor Kent Redfield, less than Pritzker's $5 million seed money.

In California, expensive ballot battles are standard warfare. In 2018 alone, more than $364 million was spent on 16 ballot proposal campaigns, according to FollowTheMoney.org, a nonprofit research group that tracks campaign expenditures.

A single committee spent $111 million.

Similar tax proposals asking voters to flip from a flat to a graduated tax have fared poorly. The most recent example in 2018 was in Colorado, where confusion played a key role in voters rejecting a sliding scale that went as high as 8.25 percent for those making more than $500,000, with the new money dedicated to public schools.

Lisa Weil, executive director of Great Education Colorado, the group that led the effort for the tax change, said putting fiscal matters on the ballot is problematic because the inherent "complexity and nuance" attached to tax policy can't all be explained in the limited space of a ballot proposition.

"It's relatively easy to sow confusion or cynicism," Weil said. "It's easier to get people to say no."

Despite a decade of polls from the Paul Simon Institute at the University of Illinois Springfield showing roughly two-thirds of the public supports the concept of a graduated tax, and despite the heightened national attention paid to the impact of income inequality, pre-election polls often aren't predictive.

The problems in Colorado underscore why Pritzker's $5 million personal check into the pro-graduated income tax camp is only a down payment, the opening bid of dueling campaigns pitting schools, pensions and promises of state financial stability against those who argue the graduated tax will cripple the state.

Even Pritzker acknowledges passage of the amendment will not solve the state's financial problems. For example, only additional $200 million would go to help solve the state's massive pension debt.

Mooney said opponents will launch two lines of attack.

"One is that taxes will be going up for some and nobody will be getting more stuff because this is money going out the window for stuff already spent, like pensions," Mooney said. "The other is, 'How well do you trust the government to take care of your money?""

For instance, in January former state Sen. Martin Sandoval pleaded guilty in federal court to one count of bribery and agreed to cooperate in an evolving widespread probe of public corruption. While the tax proposal is about Illinois' financial future, the history of political corruption is an obstacle.

"I'd be blind if I said it wasn't a hurdle," Fulks said. "It's something we're going to have to deal with and combat."

Pritzker Authorizes Remote Meetings for Local Governments, Public Bodies

Press attorney says notice requirements, public access rules still apply

by Peter Hancock Capitol News Illinois

Gov. JB Pritzker used his emergency powers Monday to waive a portion of the Illinois Open Meetings Act to allow local governments and other public bodies to hold "remote" meetings to help control the spread of the novel coronavirus disease, COVID-19.

That provision was part of an executive order the governor issued Monday also prohibiting public gatherings of 50 or more people, a new standard recommended by the U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention.

The order waives a portion of the Open Meetings Act that requires a quorum of members of a public body be "physically present" at the meeting location, and limits the circumstances under which an individual member may take part by video or audio conference.

It applies to city councils, county boards, school boards and all other public bodies of state and local government.

Don Craven, legal counsel to the Illinois Press Association, noted in an email that Pritzker did not suspend other provisions of the Open Meetings Act that require public notice be given of all meetings and that require meetings to be open and accessible to the public and press.

"He did not suspend the requirement that the meeting be held in a place open and accessible to the public," Craven said in the memo. "He did not suspend the requirement that the public be allowed to address the board, which means that there has to be a way for the public to participate by phone."

The Open Meetings Act requires public bodies to provide public notice of a meeting, including the agenda, at least 48 hours in advance of the meeting. Craven encouraged all news outlets that cover those meetings to immediately submit requests for notice of any special, emergency or regular meeting.

At the request of state Rep. Bob Morgan, D-Deerfield, IPA also drafted possible legislation allowing public bodies to meet without a physical quorum present while also ensuring that notice requirements, public participation and public access are protected.

"In times like these, the role of the local press and broadcasters is more important than ever," Morgan said in a statement. "While we need to take steps to ensure that members of public bodies can safely meet to do the important work of local government, we also need to take steps to make sure that the press and public know about these meetings, and are able to listen and participate in these meetings as well."

Coronavirus Tests Meat Supply Chain as Farm Groups Keep Food on Shelves

Officials say agriculture necessary as other industries shut down

by Ben Orner Capitol News Illinois

Meat has been among the most in-demand items at supermarkets as people stock up on essentials amid the COVID-19 pandemic.

That has people up and down Illinois' livestock supply chain – especially producers of beef and pork – trying to keep up. Industry leaders say the Illinois factories processing beef and pork are running at normal capacity with multiple shifts a day to keep shelves and meat cases stocked.

"There has been and continues to be a steady supply reaching consumers," said Jill Johnson, executive vice president of the Illinois Beef Association. "In the beef industry right now, there's nothing that's pointing to not being able to fulfill that demand."

As orders for pork – of which Illinois is the fourth-biggest producer in the country – come in more frequently from grocery stores, the state's three major pork packing facilities are functioning at normal capacity, according to Illinois Pork Producers Association Executive Director Jennifer Tirey.

"Our farmers don't stop working during this. They are in it for the long haul. And we are moving meat to grocery stores on a daily basis," she said.

While meat flies off supermarket shelves, some of the stress on the supply chain is eased by a decrease in orders from restaurants, which had to close their doors to dine-in customers this week.

"We've actually had grocery stores be able to step in and pick up that slack," Johnson said. "So in terms of keeping beef moving to a consumer, that's not an issue."

Jacob Liebman, a Central Illinois beef cattle farmer with a small farm in Morgan County, said he has had a consistent stream of calls and texts from slaughterhouses, including one on Friday morning searching for more ground beef.

"He was looking for old bulls, old cows, just things that can be turned into hamburger, basically," Liebman

Mike Doherty, a senior economist at the Illinois Farm Bureau, said one potential strain on the supply chain is uncertainty in the workforce for slaughterhouses and processing plants.

During the COVID-19 outbreak, Illinois has closed schools and put an added emphasis on caring for the elderly. So despite processing plants having "generally younger workers," Doherty said some employees might need to stay home.

Tirey said pork packers "are managing to continue with normal operations," but "as time goes on," they have expressed similar concerns about workforce availability.

Johnson said the beef industry has "not seen the workforce be impacted in a large way by what's happening"

The ag industry also got a vote of confidence in uncertain times at both the state and federal government level week

Gov. JB Pritzker issued a "stay-at-home" order Friday, closing all non-essential businesses from Saturday at 5 p.m. through April 7. But all ag and food operations are among the "essential businesses and operations" that will continue to operate.

"Agriculture and the press, veterinarians and plumbers, laundromats and banks, roads, bridges, and transit – the fundamental building blocks that keep our society safe and steady – will not be closing down," Pritzker said.

The U.S. Department of Homeland Security on Thursday classified agriculture as a "critical infrastructure" industry in a guidance letter, naming it alongside health care services and pharmaceuticals as necessary for American health, safety and economic security.

The guidance tells state governments to prioritize continued operations of such essential businesses as grocery stores, restaurants, truck stops, food processing plants, food safety workers and farm workers.

Tirey said the guidance will likely mean workers will get easier access to future government aid and COVID-19 tests to limit disruptions to production and processing.

"We're also advocating at the federal level, that if our farmers need lines of credit, if they need support financially, that those things be provided to them," Tirey added. "Because if they can't continue to operate their business, they can't continue to help the consumers."

Federal and state transportation agencies have also loosened regulations in the past week to make it easier for trucks to deliver food.

The U.S. Department of Transportation exempted semitrailers, including livestock haulers, from normal limits on driver hours as long as they are carrying certain food or medical supplies and equipment.

Pritzker also waived fees for overweight trucking permits for the movement of emergency relief supplies, including food but not livestock. However, fees for livestock haulers have been waived nationwide by the U.S. Department of Transportation.

Liebman noted that while a majority of people can work from home during the COVID-19 pandemic, farmers can't, and he called the continuance of the supply chain "a matter of national security."

"It's just like a snowstorm, except it's a long one. We don't know how long it's going to take, but everyone's still out there," he said. "Farmers are still going to be out there doing their job in pretty much full capacity, as usual."

Doherty said that as long as processing, shipping and transportation networks keep running, people should not be concerned about food.

"This country can feed itself. And for the most part right now, agriculture has not been disrupted," he said.

The Illinois Department of Public Health reported 585 cases of COVID-19 as of Friday, including five deaths. Though cases have been confirmed in 25 counties, health officials say everyone should assume the virus is already in their community.

For those with general COVID-19 questions, the Illinois Department of Public Health maintains a hotline at 1-800-889-3931 and an email address (dph. sick@illinois.gov).

Customers looking for tips on how to store the meat they purchased can get information from the National Cattleman's Beef Association, the National Pork Board and the National Chicken Council.

Stay-at-Home Order

The pantry is in need of donations. The demand for food will be more than we have ever experienced, and more than we are presently able to provide. The Stay-at-Home Order in Illinois and the loss of income for so many families make your donation so important.

None of us knows how long this will last but with your help we can minimize the pain for our community. For every dollar donated the pantry is able to purchase $8 worth of food. Normally 2/3 of our neighbors are fixed income/social security incomes and a 1/3 are people that are in a temporary tight spot. We expect the later group to expand.

We need your help.

We are open for food distribution every Tuesday 8:00 am - 2:30 pm (limit one visit per-month)
